

Railroad and Express Wax Document Sealers REVISED 4/1/12

Originally, the typical usage for these often one-of-a-kind collectibles was to officially 'seal' a document envelope with a wax-embossed impression. Usually marked with a company name and (but not always) the origin location, their purpose was to prevent or reveal the possibility of tampering with an envelopes' contents during company or public mail/express company transit, while enroute to the final destination. Considered by many to truly be "museum pieces", as a given company may have had only one or two sealers per place-name locale. All are typically between ~2-1/4" and ~4" long, with a wood, brass, or steel 'shaft' and usually a brass "matrix" or head, that can be typically from ~7/8" to ~1-1/2" round or oval in shape. Needless to say, these gems are not at all easy to come by!
